

LOVE in leadership

Be clear about your expectations

As in any relationship, letting the other person know what you need is a key to success. Lack of clarity or communication simply leaves people guessing about how to make things work.

Give positive feedback

When things are going well, be sure to recognize people. At its core, being loved is being seen. When you see someone doing great work let them know you've noticed.

Be honest

Avoiding difficult conversations under the guise of kindness is hurting more than helping. Loving means leaning in...even (and especially) when it's hard.

Understand and celebrate differences

Not everyone will take the same approach, find the same solutions, or communicate the same way. Learn about people so you can amplify their individual strengths and combine them in powerful ways.

Love yourself

Take time to recharge, unplug and do something for yourself that fills your bucket. You are most likely giving a lot to others, and you can only give what you have so be sure to take care of YOU.
